Google has revealed that it has unblocked over 50 high-risk apps from the Google Play Store on Android. The announcement comes just months after Google announced the Play Protect security service that would scan apps in the Google Play Store for malware. Google has been at the forefront of bringing stability and security to Android by preventing apps that violate its developer policies from reaching users. Google Play Protect is a test service that checks Android apps at the time of installation and periodically thereafter. As part of its efforts to improve security, Google Play Protect scans apps in the Google Play Store for malware, as well as those downloaded from third-party app stores. Google will reportedly stop scanning for apps that are already installed on a user's device. However, Google said that it will continue to monitor apps that are installed from third-party sources, even if Play Protect blocks their installation. "We continue to evaluate the security of apps downloaded from the Play Store even after they've been installed on a device. We will also continue to work to protect Android users from harmful apps and malicious links and will take action to prevent them from being installed. We will make available updates to both Android and Play Protect to further improve security of both products," a Google spokesperson told ZDNet in a statement. Google has not revealed what apps are affected, but it said that it is taking action on all apps that are rated P2 or above. This move by Google is likely to affect the number of apps that are available on Google Play. However, the bigger problem is that there are many apps that have been blocked by Play Protect for years and this may impact users' security and privacy. Google said that it is continuing to monitor for malicious apps and identifying malicious apps and links and will continue to do
