The program had a stable GUI, and its features were well organized. The compilation process was rather quick and efficient. In addition, the compiled file was executed directly after the compilation process was completed, without requiring users to configure its execution. However, when the user types the actual filename in the executable file, it's going to start an additional program automatically, instead of running the AutoHotkey script and executing it, because it's already saved in the program's database. The executable file will launch the command prompt and open a file named Autostart to be executed each time the computer restarts. Therefore, in order to be run when the computer starts, the AutoHotkey file needs to be saved in such folder, and only then will the AutoHotkey script start automatically after computer restart. Additionally, the compiled file is saved in one of the system's folders, which is named Winx86, and so, users do not need to save it, in order to be able to run it on any platform. After compiling the AutoHotkey script, a small window is going to appear on the screen, letting you know whether or not the program was successfully created, as well as the total compilation time. Furthermore, in order to personalize the executable, users can add a product description and a company info. They can also add a copyright file, and a language and character set information. The latter is especially helpful when one wants to personalize the script and make it available for other users. However, even though users can add language and character set, the compiler does not replace the default AutoHotkey language, and so, if one wants to personalize a script he has already created, one has to do so manually. Furthermore, the tool provides a variety of scripts, including one for enabling one to customize the taskbar appearance. Users can also
