The above screenshot is an example of what players in the game will see when they are motion-controlled. Players are controlled with four "movement buttons" and "skill buttons" on the controller. Skill buttons allow players to perform a variety of football moves: dribble, shoot, pass, and others. The movement buttons allow you to use sprint, tackle, shoot, pass, etc. You can customize each button to control certain football moves. The button setup is meant to help novice and experienced players alike. "We've added two more buttons to the right of the D-pad and the left," Product Group Head of FIFA Stefan Smith told IGN. "One to select the skill button. There's the four buttons to control the movement. And we've added a fifth button to the left that is a control for the left hand." The player's "core" button (we assume that's the goal kick button) is also a control. Although it's all a bit technical at first, Smith said. "That's about it. That's essentially the motion-control system." The Motion Capturing There's a lot more information than what was just mentioned above. Players wear a small motion-capture suit that has sensors that record data about a player's movement. Some people wear the motion-capture suit over their regular clothing; others wear it over a shirt with numbers on it. The players then perform mini-sessions, usually a few minutes at a time, to collect enough data for the game to work. Once the players are done, the data is then sent to EA Sports and processed to prepare it for the game. "We go through it and we process it," Smith said. "The player movement is recorded, player types. Then we use a biomechanics platform that looks at the quality and the timing of the movement. We're not interested in how far it was, how high it went, but the quality of the movement. Did it count as a tackle or was it a dribble? Was the movement in the game correct? Did it look good?" To make sure players can move on the field just like they do in real life, Smith said the data is analyzed to make
