The most common electronic device used for this is a computer, which comprises the bulk of personal computer and video game console hardware. Modern video games vary in complexity, incorporating graphics and gameplay. The earliest examples of electronic games were simple discrete event driven tasks, and mechanical or electro-mechanical devices such as the LGP-30 electrified ping-pong game, the pinball machine, and the electromechanical hockey game. Other games, such as the Russian dominoes, were non-electronic and used physical or chemical means to register a win or loss, or to show a score. Comments: 2 Comments Dean I agree with Finske on the third 6-11. I would still give no points to the 6-10 acrosses, but by the same token, maybe give the 6-11s one point each. It's the first I've ever seen give a definite bonus or penalty to one team in a rankings system. Dean, are you talking the 2012 blog? I, for one, haven't made any significant changes. And smt, you call 5-6 a mystery. It's clear as day to any football fan. There are 5 downs worth of time during each play. Yes, it's apparent to the casual fan that they are being timed like this. The off tackle was, and remains a mystery. But you'll see it a lot more often now, so it's not a mystery anymore. In regards to the replays, the announcers aren't calling 5 separate first downs in a row when the play is over. They are calling a single play, and then pointing to the coach or the referee when they come up with the call. So if we want to view these as replays, I'm comfortable with that. But the announcers are calling it like it is: there is one play, and it is going to be either a first down or stop. So, why not treat it like it is? A clarification on numbers of points, because Finske has a solid point. If you call one play for 15 yards, it's a first, and if you call a second down, that's a second. Hard numbers, I know; but until the current NCAA attempts to have its own replay system in place, I can understand why someone would view these as replays. My apologies to the NCAA, that I don't agree with your number of points. This oughta solve the debate about the north 4th down...there's either 2 or 3 players in the block, depending on which team was down. Anyways, to use a football reference, your mind plays tricks on you, so you should trust your mind not to find the ball, especially this time of year when you're still exhausted. But this is for Teamslide; who do you think would benefit the most from a red zone? SF because they use the two-tight end set which is rare for the NCAA, or Duke because they're using the more traditional three-wide sets? I
