Before the launch of FIFA 22, EA decided not to put any version of FIFA into the All-Stars mode, as they were unable to accurately model the movement of players running at full speed. EA Sports confirmed that players with gamer-adaptive control will be able to play as All-Stars free-kicks, while player ratings have been re-adjusted to reflect a more realistic and playable skill-level. The ratings for All-Stars when FIFA 20 was launched was measured at a 'Simulation' rating of 84, while All-Stars in FIFA 22 launches with a simulation rating of 94, with the ability to take the rating to as high as 98.

"All of the gameplay data was captured on real-life football boots. With the data, we were able to improve some of the basic mechanics and gameplay," said Grant Ewer, FIFA Gameplay Lead for FIFA 22. "Players like Hulk, Thierry Henry and Paul Scholes had a huge influence on our decision to improve the performance of players." To help improve the boot-to-foot response in key areas, EA has included a unique Active Touch Accuracy System (ATAS) which is created using motion capture data. The system also uses the player's own boot information, like stud height and heel width, which then provides an even more accurate off-the-ball sense to improve ball and player movement. Key features of the new FIFA 22 gameplay systems: Action Cues - To make the gameplay more fluid, EA has made changes to Action Cues including reducing the number of Cues and making them more accessible. These changes include: New Open Cues. New Closed Cues. New Quick Tap Cues. New "Hail Mary" Cues Cue Curve, New Heel Height and Heel Width Improved Action Cues. Gameplay Changes Razor Sharp Movements - EA has made several changes to improve the responsiveness of the system. Players can now sprint much more naturally as momentum comes naturally rather than forcing sprints. Players have sharper movement and can cut inside or move diagonally with much more ease. The changes include: Changes to the Jump System. Players can now sprint smoothly without the typical jump animation. Users can now move with the intention of making a pass rather than jumping with the ball or dribbling. Improved

Carl Carlsen has been clear about his stance on the U.S. embargo on Cuba: It's time to end it, and he's making that case in his campaign for governor of Maine, arguing that even as the trade embargo has failed to reduce public health and poverty, it has cost the state billions of dollars in revenue over the past 50 years. His stance has been a frequent talking point among the leaders of other U.S. states with more liberal views on Cuba policy, who say it's time to put the embargo behind them, too, just in time for a possible presidential transition next year that would pave the way for lifting the 50-year-old trade embargo. The issue of the trade embargo came up at a forum on Latin American policy in New York on Tuesday, when Carlsen took a microphone and pointed out to the audience that the embargo has cost the state $16 billion, of which $2.7 billion was spent on prison construction. "It's time to right that wrong and let the American people and the citizens of Maine have access to the markets in Cuba," he said. For Carlsen, who is the son of the late former Gov. Paul R.
