To compare the diagnostic accuracy of standard fetal echocardiographic measurements with quantitative fetal lung ultrasound (FLU) and color Doppler (CDP) measurements in the assessment of fetal pulmonary vascular status. A prospective study was performed in a tertiary care center, comparing invasive diagnostic procedures (ductus venosus pulsed wave, DVPP, and umbilical artery Doppler flow velocity waveforms) with quantitative FLU and CDP in 52 women with a singleton pregnancy undergoing fetal echocardiography. Receiver operating characteristics curve analysis was used to define the diagnostic parameters of echocardiography. The diagnostic criteria of CDP were a ratio of peak systolic to end-diastolic velocity of at least 4:1, and FLU an absence of lung aeration. These criteria were applied in all cases. Compared with the invasive procedures, these measurements had higher sensitivity, specificity, positive predictive value, negative predictive value, positive likelihood ratio, and area under the curve.
