When James Rodriguez, a Manchester City player and one of the most technically gifted players in the world, was installed as a full-time starter at RB, he thrived. He blossomed into an attacking force, a direct threat, scoring lots of goals. Some of those are the true goals you'd expect from a world class talent like James. But others are surprisingly off the mark. What can we say? James's shooting from outside the box really needs work. And of course there are the clear signs of MK2 James Rodriguez. The MK2 James Rodriguez is very much a revelation. He's become a first team player within weeks. He's done nothing wrong in this sense. He's simply played football more over the last couple of years and been used by the manager. He's also played for the Colombian national team, which has a lot of talented footballers. MK2 James uses his speed and dribbling abilities to push defenders out of the way before unleashing long, powerful shots. He's not a particularly good finisher, but that's just fine. I don't like his style of play, but I love his ability to drive defenders out of the way. In my opinion, Juan Cuadrado is absolutely a better player than MK2 James at the moment. Juan Cuadrado is simply more useful at Chelsea than MK2 James is at Man City. I can't get behind MK2 James' style of play. It's too easy for defenders to sit back and watch defenders like him run towards them with the ball. There's nothing better than the sight of defenders who think they're safe, then miss a lunging tackle from your team's madman striker. If defenders think they can just sit back and leave you shoot goals, you will do so. If you watch MK2 James play, it's clear he's a guy that wants to get to the ball, time and time again. If a defender sits back, he'll take him on, (sadly) take a step or two back and then embarrass the defender before shooting from outside the box. The key is to get that defender back to his original position. Of course, MK2 James is nowhere near as good as the real MK2 James from last year
